

Kingston Product and Furniture Design graduates present their exclusive ‘This Way Up’ exhibition at the 2025 London Design Festival - “moving on” & “moving up” to a new stage of their design careers

The 2025 Kingston Product and Furniture Design class will be hosting a collective exhibition at The Old Street Gallery within the Shoreditch Design Triangle during the 2025 London Design festival (LDF) in September. The creative cohort’s ‘This Way Up’ exhibition showcases 35 final pieces designed and manufactured by each individual.

The exhibition will celebrate the outcomes of 19 students, highlighting the varying array of talent shaped at Kingston. The show will feature a range of design objects and pieces of furniture from perforated bowls to new cameras, alongside an array of seating and shelving systems. Every object in the catalogue was produced by the students at the Kingston School of Art workshops, based on individual designs developed over the past year. Each piece is very different and offers something new to the world of design.

This Way Up is self-organised and hosted by the collective, and offers a first look at the future of design for the next generation. This final celebration of the students’ journey through education and intensive studies into product design, manufacturing processes, and material development, marks the pivotal moment of “moving up” in the design world and “moving in” to a new stage of their design careers. Join them in honouring their times as students and encouraging a generation of new-thinkers and makers.

This Way Up will be open from the 16th – 21st of September, with designers available to speak to the wider ambitions and processes of the exhibition. The opening night will be a special private view night to unveil the exhibition to all friends, families and those who look to support the Kingston Product and Furniture Design cohort of 2025!
